Type scale

Spacing between letters (tracking) and line height varies with the optical size of text

There is a simple mathematical formula for calculating the line height—and one for calculating the tracking—given a font size.

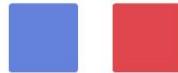

Line-height = Font size + 8

Letter space = 0%

Blue is our primary accent color. We use it sparingly and only for interactive elements like the selected tool, the share button, primary buttons and hyperlinks.

We have a number of secondary accent colors used to call out various contexts. For instance, we use purple for components to indicate their subtle differences from non-component objects.

Hot pink is used for assistive UI, like Smart Selection canvas decorations.

Red and yellow are used to indicate error and cautionary conditions. For example, when a font is missing a warning icon is drawn in yellow in the toolbar. When an error occurs during publishing of a library, red is used for the Visual Bell to signal failure.

The font color is replaced by a softer black (rather than pure black), and the hue has a deep navy blue color brightness, which reduces the brightness of the white background, and at the same time allows users to obtain more information when obtaining information. Comfortable and more immersive reading experience.

Basic foreground

Basic foreground colors of UI elements is always drawn in black or white with a varying alpha component, rather than predefined greyscale colors.

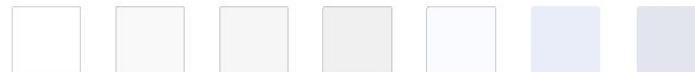

Black .95 Black .8 Black .4
000000 .95 000000 .8 000000 .4

White is used in the same way as black, but for dark backgrounds.

Background

Background colors of UI elements are always solids without an alpha component.

White is most commonly used for page backgrounds and card backgrounds. When the style of the card appears on the page and the card is white. The background color can be appropriately selected from light gray including: Grey F9; Grey F6; Grey F0

Light blue background is used in some special scenes, text is selected, card is selected, etc.
